WEATHER

WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION:

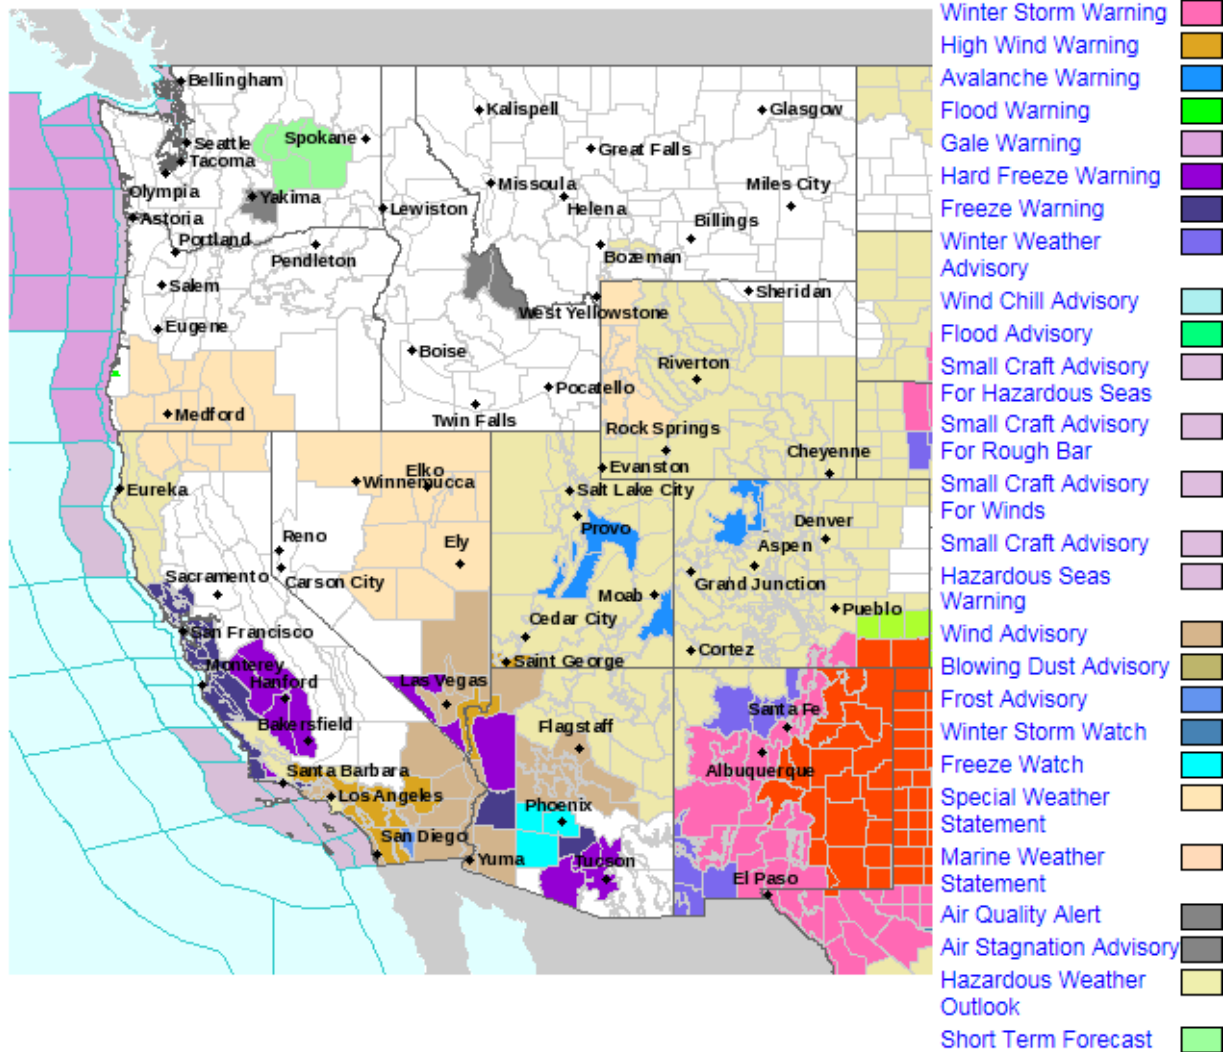

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

High pressure from the eastern Pacific Ocean has begun to build into Northern California as yesterday's trough shifts eastward. Mainly clear skies now prevail across the region with a fairly cold air mass in place. Modest Northerly winds are the only factor keeping temperatures across the Valley from dipping below freezing. High pressure will continue to build over the region today and tonight. Locally breezy North to Northeast winds will continue through the afternoon before the pressure gradient relaxes. This should set the stage for a pretty cold night tonight across the forecast area, probably the coldest of this stretch. Most of the forecast area should reach below freezing early Sunday morning, with widespread teens over the mountains.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

Cold high pressure building over the Great Basin, coupled with strong winds aloft will continue to fuel strong, possibly damaging 'cold' Santa Ana winds over Southern California through late tonight. The areas most affected will continue to be along the San Bernardino mountain ridge tops, Western Inland Empire, Santa Ana mountains, Southern and Eastern portions of the Orange County and the San Diego County coastal mountain foothills.
